THE FILM SOCIETY

1925 - 1939
a guide to collections

Introduction

The Film Society Logo

1995 WAS THE 70TH ANNIVERSARY of the founding of the Film Society, making it an appropriate choice as the subject of the first in an occasional series of Guides to the Collections to be published by the Library and Information Service of the British Film Institute; appropriate because so much of the film culture we take for granted today stems from the Society's innovative programming. A national movement was born which formed the basis of local film societies, independent regional cinemas and the National Film Theatre; many of its prints were donated to the National Film Archive in 1942, and the work which it began has been continued by the BFI, the British Federation of Film Societies, and the film festivals which have sprung up since all over the world.

Modelled on the Stage Society (which put on single performances of uncommercial or controversial plays for its members on Sundays) the Film Society aimed to screen films of artistic and technical interest which were not shown in commercial cinemas, encouraging a serious approach to film-making as an art. To understand the scope of its ambitions and the scale of its achievements, it is necessary to remember how things were in 1925. The medium of film itself was barely 30 years old, and as Ivor Montagu reminded us in a 50th anniversary article in Sight and Sound in 1975 (1), there were "no film institutes, no film archives, no Oscars, no film festivals, no film schools... no really functional educational cinema, scientific research cinema, historical record cinema, no specialised cinema theatres..."

The Founders

WHO WERE THE PEOPLE who brought the Film Society into being? The first Council was notable for its youth.

SIDNEY BERNSTEIN was 26, a film exhibitor who had taken over the family chain of music halls on his father's death three years previously and transformed them into cinemas. By the end of the decade he was to build the first of the famous Granada super-cinemas. He formed the production company Transatlantic Pictures with Alfred Hitchcock after World War Two, producing Rope, Under Capricorn and I Confess, before going on to create one of the first four British independent television companies, Granada, in the 1950s.

IVOR MONTAGU was 20, not long down from Cambridge and already a member of the executive committee of the Holborn branch of the Labour Party. The youngest son a peer (Baron Montagu of the banking family) he was a zoologist and founder-president of the International Table Tennis Federation. He had been a film critic on the University magazine Granta, and became the first film critic of The Observer in 1926.

He was to work with Michael Balcon and Alfred Hitchcock in the next decade as associate producer on The Man Who Knew Too Much, The 39 Steps, The Secret Agent and Sabotage. He was also to become a founder member of the Association of Cine Technicians, join the Communist Party and become the close friend and champion of Sergei Eisenstein, collaborating on the screenplays of the unproduced

ADRIAN BRUNEL was 33. He had trained as an opera singer and worked in the booking office of Moss Empires Bioscope Company, before joining the film department of the Ministry of Information. Perhaps one of the 'forgotten men' of British film, he spent many years trying to get work after Elstree Calling in 1930, only to end up churning out 'quota quickies'. An indication of how the trade viewed the Society is shown by the fact that Brunel had to leave the Council before the end of the first season, as his employer insisted that his association with the Society would damage the prestige of the films he made for them (2).

Pudovkin's Mat screened in 1928

IRIS BARRY was 29 and film critic on The Spectator. She subsequently established the first US film archive at the New York Museum of Modern Art, becoming its first curator, and it is easy to forget how innovative it was at that time to treat cinema as another art. One of her first achievements was to gain the trust of DW Griffith, enabling MOMA to save his archive for posterity. Unlike some single-minded film critics, Barry brought to bear on her work not only a love of films but a literary catholicity of taste, and a love and knowledge of music and painting.

HUGH MILLER was a striking 36 year-old actor from Berwick upon Tweed whose film roles included Paganini and Charles I. WALTER MYCROFT another film critic, who was to turn his hand to filmmaking, first as a scriptwriter and adapter, and later as a prolific producer of such films as Mister Cinders, Blossom Time and Invitation To The Waltz. The final member of the first Council was the sculptor FRANK DOBSON.

The Context

IN HIS UNPUBLISHED HISTORY OF The Film Society (3) written in the early 1960s, critic and film historian David Robinson quotes the Hon. Mrs. Ewan Montagu: "There wasn't much to do on Sunday afternoons. Maybe a concert at the Albert Hall or the Queen's Hall. But generally you played golf or did nothing. That's why the Film Society was quite a social event. It was quite a thing to do, to have someone to lunch on Sunday and then to go off to the Film Society."

The Adventures of Prince Ahmed - the first full length animated feature

Though the popular press jeered, the Film Society became fashionable with the intelligentsia, the Bohemian 'beau monde' made up of 'young men with beards and young women in home-spun cloaks' (4). Founder members included Anthony Asquith, George Bernard Shaw and HG Wells. Montagu's own family were always loyal supporters of the Society, despite characterising its meetings as 'Ivor's Sunday afternoons of gloom' (5), but the Committee intended the programmes to be fun as well as informative and educational; animation, burlesques, and comedies from Lubitch, Chaplin and Keaton were screened. The venture was so successful that the venue had to be changed from the 1,400 seater New Gallery to the Tivoli which could accommodate between 2,000-3,000 people.

The Programmes

SIGNIFICANT MOMENTS IN THE HISTORY OF CINEMA are documented in the programmes which the Society screened. There was an early focus on German Expressionism and films such as das Cabinet des Dr. Calagari, Dr. Mabuse Der Spieler and Orlacs Hande were shown as revivals. This practice fostered an appreciation of the interest of old films, which flowered in the 1930s into the film archive movement. However, the membership were less impressed by Murnau's Nosferatu "noteworthy for the now discarded trick effects attempted...the general production combines the ridiculous and the horrid in about the same proportion as the play", than by the first Soviet film to be screened, Pudovkin's Mat during the fourth season in 1928.

Below: Illustration from the pressbook of Maedchen in Uniform, 1931

The Society (and Montagu in particular) had long wanted to show the exciting and innovative work coming out of the Soviet Union, but when these screenings eventually took place they met with hostile reactions from both the censors and the popular press - indeed, the Society was accused of being an agent of Moscow. (In 1929, Montagu was moved to publish a pamphlet The Political Censorship of Films, explaining how the British Board of Film Censors came by its powers and urging that the censorship system be revised). Even so, the great

The screening of Alexander Nevsky in April 1939 was to be the Society's last

Soviet films like Potomok Chinglis-Khana and Staroye i Novoe were shown for the first time in Britain by the Society, and Pudovkin and Eisenstein were invited to lecture to members on film technique.

Bronenosets Potyomkin was screened at the 33rd performance on 10 November 1929, sharing the programme with a short. The Fall of the House of Usher; a Mickey Mouse cartoon The Barn Dance - and John Grierson's Drifters, a documentary on the North Sea herring fisheries. This screening signalled the beginning of the relationship between the Film Society and the British documentary - from then on the Society showed nearly all the best work of the British documentarists as it appeared.

As the 1930s progressed, there was a notable decrease in the number of new German films available for screening, as the German film industry declined under the inexorable rise of Nazism. The development of experimental cinema, the advent of sound, the introduction of colour - all these landmarks can be traced through the programmes. The Film Society Council were the first people to show the work of Leni, Berger, Wiene, Czinner, L'Hervier, Pabst, Reiniger, Renoir, Clair, Cavalcanti, Ivens, Lye and many others in this country, and the first to screen anything Japanese. One programme (no.38) consisted of films made or written by women, including the controversial study in surrealism, La Coquille et le Clergyman by Germaine Dulac, rejected by the BBFC as being "so cryptic as to be almost meaningless. If there is a meaning, it is doubtless objectionable."

The Society bowed out on 23 April 1939, the 108th performance, with Eisenstein's first sound film, Alexander Nevski, completed the previous year.

After the war, no-one felt the need to revive it - its work was done. As Montagu remembered in 1975, "there were fewer unshown worthwhile films to hunt. Already the last two seasons before the end had cut down the regular eight performances to six. What need of the Film Society when so many of its aims had been attained, so many reinforcements had arrived to take over?" The BFI, the NFA, the BFFS, the emerging film festivals had all taken up the banner.

Conclusion

THE FILM SOCIETY had been created initially because its originators wanted to see the films it presented themselves, and assumed there were other like-minded souls who would also be interested. It operated in a now vanished and almost unrecognisable world, which it did much to change - its work recorded for posterity in this Collection. The material in the Collection was donated to the Library and Information Service of the British Film Institute by Lord Bernstein. For other special collections which may be of interest, see Anthony Asquith, Thorold Dickinson and Ivor Montagu. The Special Materials Unit (LIS) incorporates the holdings of unpublished scripts, pressbooks and special collections which have been acquired gradually since the inception of the BFI in 1933. It aims to collect original material on British cinema and television history.
